

Close at hand

A tool-belt is a good idea in order to keep tools close to hand while you work and, while this option is great if you're working at heights as it means no more having to go up and down ladders to fetch the one tool you really needed and left at the bottom, it's not so great when you're working at floor level. How often have you found yourself crouching down on a job and all your tools have fallen out of your tool-belt or dug painfully into your side?

Another clever idea is ToughBuilt's Cliptech system, a handy tool pouch that is simple to clip on and off the company's tool-belt. The neat thing with this product is that you can keep your tools close to hand without having to 'wear' them. Imagine if you could have your screwdrivers, pipe cutters and water pump pliers right there with you exactly when you need them without having to even go into your tool bag? When it's time to get down to work, the pouch can be unclipped from your belt and propped up next to you for handy access to your tools when working at floor level. When you're on the move, the specially designed clip system enables the tool pouch to be clipped on to a dedicated rail so that the contents don't fall out. How many times have you put a tool bag down on the floor of your van only to find the contents spilled everywhere when you get to a job?

My advice? It's important to make the right choice for you so don't be afraid to get hands-on at point of sale. Open up the boxes and bags on display, see how they can be used to organise your tools and give them a lift to see how easy they are will be to carry around all day. After all if you're going to be heading up several flights of stairs from your van to jobs, you probably don't want products that are going to leave you feeling like you've had a workout before you even start work.
